

CAMPO DE' FIORI

SHEFFIELD, MASSACHUSETTS

A vital stop when visiting Rome is the Campo de' Fiori. A rectangular public square just south of the Piazza Navona, Campo de' Fiori—which translates from the Italian as “field of flowers”—plays host to an open-air market that has sold fresh produce, meat, fish, spices, and flowers since the mid-1800s. It's a spirited, bustling place whose perimeter is dotted with cafes, restaurants, and a bakery that produces wafer-thin pizzas.

Inspired by this square in Rome, where his family had a home, Robin Norris and his wife, Barbara Bockbrader, have created a line of moss-covered terra-cotta and stone pots and planters that celebrate Rome's elegance and history.

These containers, along with unique outdoor furniture and garden accessories, are showcased at Norris and Bockbrader's Campo de' Fiori, a shop located in a barn that sits on four acres of land in a small Massachusetts town nestled in the Berkshires.

Norris designs the pots and planters and oversees their production in Mexico, while Bockbrader, a horticulturalist by training, marries plantings to the vessels her husband creates and oversees the gardens that surround the shop.
